First Do No Harm is not a long book, and I felt there were too many internal struggles in too few pages. Also, the rising action was relatively long, making the resolution abrupt and denouement too short. But I guess the too slow build was mainly caused by the plot line being a little all over the place.

However, "first, do no harm" is either inane, insulting, disingenuous, or misleading. It is either a self-evident cliché, or it is a pernicious distortion of true medical practice. Every medical intervention causes harm. It is impossible to "do no harm", and by continuing to pretend we can, we are hurting our patients.
