Mission-type tactics, is a form of military tactics where the emphasis is on the outcome of a mission rather than the specific means of achieving it. Mission-type tactics have been a central component of the military tactics of German armed forces since the 19th century. The term Auftragstaktik was coined by opponents of the development of mission-type tactics. Opponents of the implementation of mission-type tactics were called Normaltaktiker. In today's German army, the Bundeswehr, the term Auf

The Second World War was full of creative military tactics from both sides, though only some of them turned out to be successful. One of them was Britain convincing German soldiers to abandon their posts and get sent off for medical reasons. As they couldn't exactly just go up to them and tell them about it, they decided that the best way to do it was printing it on matchbooks and ...

One of the earliest tactics developed was the staggered combat box formation. Taking into account statistics and surviving bomber crews' experience, the USAAF trained bomber pilots to fly in tight formations or "boxes," as you'll see in the picture below. This allowed all B-17 gunners to protect each other.

The Seleucids used phalanx-based tactics which were becoming outdated. It resulted in their army moving extremely slowly which made it easy for Judah to pick them off. His lightning-fast militia caused havoc in the early part of the revolt and at the Battle of Emmaus in 166 BC, Judah used all his advantages to earn a stunning victory.
