You don't have to describe every detail (this counterbalances the next point, doesn't it?), but you need to tell the story in a way that allows the other person to see and experience it; it is that experience that makes your story powerful. Keep it short. Your goal is for your story to forward and solidify your message. Nothing more. So as you hone your story, do it with a knife, carving the story to its essential and important message. Practice!
