Views on the East German regime varied, but I heard no support or even excuses for the wall. By the autumn of 1989, the inefficient economy of East Germany was in decline. Anti-government demonstrations were growing. Escape routes to the West had opened through Hungary. New and relatively inexperienced rulers, wanting to accede to reforms while ...

Fall of Berlin Wall, Rise of Globalization

The latter—globalization in Asia—implies that globalization as a process originated in the West and historically, through diffusion, has reached and thus incorporated other geographical regions such as Asia. That description, I would argue, more closely fits the idea of modernization rather than globalization.
