When a heart contracts and forces blood into the blood vessels, there is a certain path that the blood follows through the human body. The blood moves through pulmonary circulation and then continues on through systemic circulation. Pulmonary and systemic are the two circuits in the two-circuit system of higher animals with closed circulatory systems.

The journey that follows the path of blood through our heart and body begins with the vena cava. This is the vein that deoxygenated blood, which is high in carbon dioxide, enters the heart through. Every vein in our body leads to either the superior vena cava, which brings blood from out upper body to our heart, or the inferior vena cava, which brings blood from our lower body.

Path of Blood Through the Heart | Med Health Daily

The path of blood through the heart begins with the right atrium receiving blood, which has circulated through most of the body. This blood is relatively low in oxygen because most of it has already been delivered to different organs and tissues. This blood is also relatively high in carbon dioxide, which is a product of metabolism in the tissues.
